Dissertation: Writing the Fragments: William James & Composition in an Age of (Dis)Connection

This project argues that recent economic and technological trends have sparked rampant social fragmentation, and that composition must respond. Inspired by the thought of American philosopher William James (1842-1910), it recenters composition theory on the thinking-feeling human body, and that body's relationship to objects and others. It then presents a writing pedagogy designed to help individuals more productively engage these alien entities. Drawing on my own teaching experience, this project suggests that understanding writing as a process of (re)orientation towards difference can revitalize both composition theory and classroom practice.
